

About the evidence-gathering process -results of the International Roundtable

On the first day, apart from the words of greetings and welcome, the meeting was organized based on the national documents prepared by the different delegations.

In most cases, special interest was placed in the restructuring of the energy sector. This reality implies significant changes in the way energy is produced, distributed and consumed. These changes are often driven by energy and climate policy objectives, such as the transition to cleaner and more sustainable sources of energy. However, these changes can give rise to challenges and conflicts between different actors and stakeholders.

One of the main objectives of this project is to train its representatives in solving problems related to the changes that are taking place in the energy sector. The European formula for conflict resolution seeks to address these problems through an approach based on dialogue, collaboration and the participation of all parties involved.

The fight against climate change and environmental degradation is a common challenge, but not all regions and Member States start from the same situation. The Just Transition Mechanism will support regions that are highly dependent on highly carbon-intensive activities. It will help the most vulnerable citizens in the transition, facilitating access to professional recycling programs and employment opportunities in new economic sectors.

This Project is based on these ideas to develop an initiative that leads the delegations of the participating European countries to become fully involved in these challenges that the Union is facing in relation, also, to the inherent consequences of the current conflict that is taking place. pound in Ukraine with the invasion by Russia.

Also, on this day, a space was dedicated to debate in which the attendees presented their formulas to unblock crisis situations and share experiences.
